

Did you know?

The mortality rate of breast cancer is 42% higher for African American women than white women.

This is, in part, because little is known about the differences in their treatment needs. We can make strides by increasing participation in clinical research among African American women.

Join us to help drive change:

Stanford University is recruiting peer navigators to raise awareness about breast cancer and clinical trials among African American women.

Who can be a peer navigator?

Any adult interested in promoting health throughout their community through education, action, and engagement.

What will you do as a peer navigator?

- Participate in 7 educational sessions to learn about breast cancer in the African American community, health literacy, community engagement, and research
- Design a community engagement plan to educate your community about breast cancer and encourage participation in clinical research
- Receive compensation for your time and contribution of up to $500

Find more information at <http://bit.do/stanford-oce>

